Fossil fuels dead in the ground

Lloyds of London, the world's oldest insurance market, has become the latest financial firm to announce that it plans to stop investing in coal companies.

Insurance companies across the world have realised that the increased number of extreme weather events are driving claims to unacceptable levels.

The insurance sector is joining others such as the Church of England and universities in divesting from those energy sources which fuel climate change.

Sustainable Strettons

Are you interested in exploring the future shape of life in the Strettons?

Are you interested in thinking about how we might develop more sustainable ways of living?

Do you believe that there are things that we can be doing now for the sake of our children and grandchildren?

Then why not come along to our discussion group?

We meet monthly at Housmans.

Recycling targets missed

The government is going to miss its own target of 50% recycling by 2020.

Despite proclaiming a pledge to develop "ambitious new future targets and milestones", it has also been opposing European plans to set a target of 65%.

An internal report by UK officials says that 65% recycling would save £10 billion over a decade in waste, greenhouse gas and social costs.

Clean Air Victory

Client Earth has now won in the courts – against the government – for a third time!

85% of air-quality zones breach legal limits.

Rather than enforce the law, the government preferred to spend £370,000 defending its lack of action.
